The first UNDP Human Development Report was published 20 years ago (with some inputs from SID). Its aim was to shift policy debates beyond a sole focus on Gross Domestic Product per capita as the primary means for measuring a country's development. The Report introduced a new Human Development Index, which gave equal weight to other indicators including life expectancy and literacy rates. This initiative has been followed by many others which build on these early efforts to measure the progress of societies, including through the complementary work of such institutions as the OECD, the Sarkozy Commission, and various NGOs. For its part, the Human Development Report has evolved as well. The 2010 20th anniversary edition – with an Introduction by Nobel laureate Amartya Sen - constitutes an important step further in the evolution of the human development approach and its implications for social and economic policies.

Copies of the Human Development Report 2010 (in English and German) will be available at the event.
